Dad
Seldom did I let myself
Cry loud, hard, and sadly in my life
There were probably only twice

The first time I cried louder than a thunder
Was the moment when my life began
And you were just a twenty something man

Never could I remember it
Until I was told by you
For I could remember nothing

The second time I cried louder than a thunder
Was the moment when you left
And I already got older and weaker
Never could you know about it
Unless you were there
For you could hear nothing

Between the two times
There lay our joy, laugh, and memory
For the more than forty years,
For those we both shared and remembered.

Disney has made lots of films since 1928, and its first movie, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, was released in 1937. After this, Disney made so many successful movies that most people in the world at least have seen one Disney movie. Several of children's favorite movies are about romantic stories between princes and princesses. However, are the stories close to real life? A new study says that Disney movies send the wrong message to children of different classes.

A study from Duke University says that Disney hides poor people's problems in their movies. Take the seven dwarfs and Aladdin as examples. The dwarfs work as miners, but unlike the real miners in the real world, they only look happy in their lives. The story of Aladdin makes children think that it's easy to become a rich person in one night. The study also points out that rich characters from the upper classes are unhappy, but the poor always look much happier.

Besides pointing out these problems with social classes in the movies, the study also has something to say about the love stories between princes and princesses. It says that Snow White marries a rich prince after meeting him just once, but she never sees the seven dwarfs, who she sees more often, as romantic partners. They are the ones who keep waiting for her to wake up.

Some may argue that we should not take Disney movies too seriously because they are only made-up stories after all. However, we should also make sure that children don't take anything for granted because of bad stories.

"How do you get people to talk about something ordinary, ugly and boring?" asked Benjamin Von Wong, a photographer. He was worried about the plastic pollution and wanted to come up with a way to make people really care about it. The fastest way is, of course, through the Internet.

But the way of making people interested in the problem troubled Von Wong. He knew he must make something special and different to catch people's eye. To everyone's surprise, he used ten thousand plastic bottles to make a miracle.

To make people interested, he and his team asked a woman to dress up as a mermaid and lie in the plastic bottles. It looked like she was dead. Seeing a beautiful mermaid die there was really terrible and sad. Von Wong hopes in this way people may take the problem seriously and use fewer plastic bottles.

So far, his video on You Tube has been watched more than one hundred eighty thousand times. Over two thousand people like the video, and some told Von Wang they wanted to work with him. Von Wong feels really happy and hopes more and more people can take action to save our Earth.
